

Washington Reports

We work hard to get it right.

Don't be fooled by unofficial sources, which can contain errors and vary significantly in accuracy and completeness.

Only official Washington Reports published by LexisNexis®, the Washington appellate courts' contract publisher, contain all of the court-approved editorial changes and enhancements. In accordance with official guidelines, experienced editors compose thorough headnotes and case summaries, which are reviewed and approved by the opinions' authors and the Office of the Reporter of Decisions before their publication with the opinions in the official reports' advance sheets. The review process is repeated before LexisNexis publishes the opinions in a bound volume. The official reports' headnotes and case summaries, along with the Cumulative Subject Index, provide the best and most efficient means for identifying useful precedents in a cost-effective manner.

OFFICIAL

Don't run the risk of quoting language from an unofficial source.

Most online sources and unofficial printed reports contain what are essentially slip opinions, those originally filed by the appellate courts. Opinions change in many ways, large and small, before they become the final opinions found in official resources. Unofficial sources vary significantly in their level of accuracy and completeness—most do not reflect the vast majority of corrections, refinements and enhancements that come from the extensive editing of the slip opinions. Some unofficial sources are published long before the official version is finalized, sometimes printing an opinion that is later withdrawn.

Only official headnotes and case summaries present the court's viewpoint correctly.

The Washington Reports are directly controlled by the Washington appellate courts. Every opinion reflects the policies and specific directives of the courts and the opinion's author. The large majority of opinion changes are editorial changes, such as corrections to citations, quotations, word choice, etc., made exclusively for the official reports. Additional changes can reflect notations about subsequent appellate history of the case and the incorporation of orders, which sometimes substantively change the opinions. These changes are not communicated to any legal publisher other than the state's contract publisher. As a result, in every bound volume, there are multiple changes that appear only in the official reports published by LexisNexis.

Court rules require citing and quoting official sources.

General Rule 14(d) of Washington State Court Rules requires that citations "conform with the format prescribed by the Reporter of Decisions," and then refers to the rule's appendix, which sets out the Office of Reporter of Decisions Style Sheet. The Style Sheet's General Principle No. 6 explicitly requires the use of and citation to official sources.
